Whether you first hit it off with your bestie in junior high when you bonded over your shared love of The Spice Girls or you met more recently after perfecting Warrior II at the local hot yoga studio, no doubt astrology had at least a little something to do with that initial platonic spark. After all, your natal, or birth, chart — which notes your sun sign as well as your moon sign, rising, and a bevy of other planetary placements and details — speaks to your personality, interests, likes, dislikes, communication style, etc. And of course all of these aspects of who you are come into play when you're interacting with others.

That's why, by knowing your own personal astrology, you can get an accurate idea of who you'd best click with. Pro-tip: While you'll definitely want to take your sun sign into consideration as it does reflect your core identity, self-image, and confidence, you should also consider other parts of your birth chart. Your moon sign (how you care and want to be cared for), rising sign (how you present yourself to the world), and Venus sign (how you experience affection) are also key players in how you connect with current and potential friends.

So consider these social and emotional planetary placements (which you can learn from a personal chart reading, an automated report, or an app like Time Passages) as you check out the best friends for every sign.
